

1.37.10.8: The Tariffs of the Fragmented States of America

Dear Synchronauts,

We find ourselves at a critical crossroads within the planetary experiment called Earth. The global economic dynamic is once again revolving around an ancient tool: tariffs. Though presented as a form of national protection, in practice they operate as mechanisms of power, control, and division between nations. This resurgence of protectionist policies is not an isolated event; it is part of a broader pattern of global tension, where immediate economic interests outweigh cooperation and sustainability.

This phenomenon, while seemingly economic in nature, echoes deeply through both historical and cosmic events. On a terrestrial level, we need only observe the connection between the 9/11 attacks and the subsequent war in Afghanistan. The attacks caused nearly 3,000 deaths. The war, in response, spanned 20 years and resulted in over 200,000 deaths—mostly Afghan civilians and local fighters. For every person who died on 9/11, more than 67 died in the war. This disproportion reveals the emotional, ethical, and political imbalance that governs human decisions when they are driven by fear, revenge, or domination.

But if we raise our gaze even further, we find parallels with events beyond historical time. José Argüelles left us a warning when he recalled the destruction of the planet Maldek, now reduced to fragments within the asteroid belt. According to galactic memory, Maldek was once a fertile and advanced planet, destroyed by its unrestrained use of technological power and its lack of wisdom in managing energy. Its downfall was not the result of chance, but the accumulation of choices that prioritized control, competition, and separation over harmony and planetary consciousness.

Tariffs, though they may not seem like it, are today a subtle version of those past mistakes. They reflect a humanity that has yet to learn to trust in collaboration as a path to evolution. Instead of building bridges, fiscal walls are raised. Instead of exchanging knowledge and resources with respect, the logic of unilateral profit is imposed. This mode of action distances us from a vibrational economy based on reciprocity and balance with the Earth, and dangerously brings us closer to repeating the errors that led to Maldek's self-destruction.

As planetary KINs, as guardians of natural time and sowers of consciousness, we have the responsibility to remember and activate another frequency. We can and must denounce the "tariffs of the soul": the fears, prejudices, and mental structures that prevent unity. We hold the most powerful technology in the universe: art, rhythm, the word, love. We do not come to impose—we come to resonate. We do not come to compete—we come to create. And this creation must begin with how we relate, how we exchange, how we value life beyond capital.

This is not a message of alarm. It is a call. An opportunity. Maldek is not an inevitable destiny but a memory that can guide us toward evolution if we consciously choose a new path. There is still time. The Earth is breathing. Humanity is dreaming. And galactic time offers us a window of redemption.

May what we emit from our being be medicine for this planet. May our actions vibrate in the frequency of the heart. May economy, politics, and technology once again revolve around the sacred. Because when we remember who we are, there is no longer a need for tariffs or wars—only the dance of giving and receiving, in harmony with the cosmos.

Sincerely,
Galactic Maya 999
